Background

Essential oils are aromatic compounds of plants, which give them their specific aroma; they also contain therapeutic components, so they have been used all over the world several hundred years ago, for mood management and some pathologies.

By extracting, distilling and concentrating these compounds, essential oils are obtained, molecules that offer soothing, antiseptic or repellent effects. These are 100% natural, efficient and safe to use compounds that generate well-being.

Mode of action

The molecules of essential oils containing therapeutic action are absorbed by the skin or by the respiratory system, accessing the central nervous system, generating physical well-being, calm, relaxation and tranquility. A few hours later, these components are removed from the body without leaving residue.
